ONLY A DREAM.

For the Shenandoah HERALD.

Dreams are sometimes nothing more than horrid nightmares. At other times, they soothe our fears and present life in i its most attractive garb. A few nights ago, I tell asleep, as I was thinking about the helplessness of Woodstock, if we should have another destructive fire and wondered if we would be in a condition to ward off the danger, before the wintry winds shake our houses and make us fearful of confligrat o is. I thought that Woodstock had com pleted her waterworks and as the sun rose and shone upon our town, the streets presented a scene which I had never before witnessed. The air was moist and balmy. There was no dust to stifle us Along the sidewalks were scores of well dressed strangers, and among them were a number of young and beautiful girls, from the cities, attracted to our towa by the fame of its pure, mountain water. I felt as I used to feel in days that passed away, some time ago. Among the number of ladies was one that I had met, and as they passed she sweetly smiled, and said: "I am ready for the excursion which you

I soon seemed to be fulfilling my promise, for I was boating on the Shenandoah with my attractive companion. She possessed more of the graces of womanhood than I had ever seen in a single individual. Ready and willing to converse on any subject, her remarks not only bore evidence of truthfulness, but of a mind that had been carefully cultivated and was stored with the best and brightest gems that had been uttered by the good and wise of past generations. She seemed to be not only an open book, containing all that was lovely, but her voice, modulated to suit her subject, thrilled my very soul with its quaint utterances. As fond as I am of talking, I had no desire to utter a word, but was content as our boat slowly glided down the sluggish stream, to drink in every word that fell from her beautiful

We listened to the water as it rumbled, beneath our feet. We sat at the lovely spring where the mountain stream, the light of the sun, modestly spread itself in a hundred tiny streams, slaked the thirst of the heated rock and quickly descended to reform and again seek privacy beneath the mountain bowlders. It was a place where methought the gods were accustomed to assemble and partake of nature's sweetest beverage As she gazed at this lovely scene, she presented to me a still lovelier picture. Not a drop of water reflecting the rays of the sun, not a quivering leaf, fanned by the mountain breeze, not a sprig of fern clinging to the rough sand stone, not a modest little flower, shedding its sweetness all alone, seemed to escape her attention and to my excited fancy she was the prettiest creature I had ever seen.
